Aftershock fears rattle survivors

The aftershocks following the recent earthquake have caused significant fear and anxiety among survivors. Many people are still unsure of the safety of their homes and are reluctant to return. The government has taken steps to provide support and assistance to survivors, but more needs to be done. The government should provide more information on how to assess the safety of homes and should offer more financial support to survivors. The government should also provide more psychological support to survivors to help them cope with their trauma. The government should ensure that survivors have access to all the resources they need to rebuild their lives.
